

RECAP

About Asperger Syndrome

People with Asperger Syndrome may not pick up on social cues and may lack instinctive social skills.

People with Asperger Syndrome may have difficulty reading other people's body language and facial expressions.

People with Asperger Syndrome may be preoccupied with only one or a few interests, which they may be very knowledgeable about.

People with Asperger Syndrome can be socially anxious and find social situations challenging and stressful. They find it difficult to read other people's behaviour.

People with Asperger Syndrome may have a one-sided conversational style and have a "formal" speaking style.

Sensory processing problems are common for people with Asperger Syndrome

People with Asperger Syndrome can learn social skills and how to read others' social cues.

People with Asperger Syndrome are typically uninterested in following social norms and fads, allowing for creative thinking and the pursuit of original interests and ideas.

People with Asperger Syndrome like to operate within defined structures and rules and regulations.

People with a diagnosis of Asperger Syndrome are of average or above average intelligence. Many have graduate and post graduate qualifications.

People with Asperger Syndrome like to look at the world a little differently leading to many making careers in engineering and scientific studies.

People with Asperger Syndrome also have a strong moral compass when interpreting right and wrong.